well-written & compelling

By children's librarian

I loved this compelling and terrific look at a very important subject. Illegal immigration is much in the news these days, but people rarely seem to see or think about the human faces and stories behind the headlines. This story of a Bangladeshi family who have successfully "passed" as legal for years in New York but are caught up in the post-9/11 crackdown on anyone Muslim is a heartwrenching look at the people affected every day by bureaucratic tangles and injustices, as well as American prejudices and fears. The father wrenched from his family and detained for months, the "star student" daughter who is afraid to tell anyone at school her family's situation, the younger, quieter daughter who works to find a way out of the catastrophe that has befallen the family--these characters come vividly to life and it's impossible not to imagine what it would be like in their situation.

Very realistic.

I found the book very interesting. It showed the emotions of the main character, Nadira, very clearly as she went through the struggles of becoming a U.S. citizen right after the 911 attacks. People were very suspicious of people who appeared to be Middle Eastern, and as she was from Bangladesh she was almost deported with her family because all of them had expired visas. Prior to the 911 tragedy, they would have had the chance to renew their visas easily, and because of the tragedy, her father was arrested as the U.S. government was being very cautious and strict about such things. Nadira had been in the U.S. since she was 8, and because she was now 14, this was especially traumatic as she and her family couldn't have predicted the terrorist attacks, or the changes that would happen afterwards, and they really wanted to be citizens and considered the United States their home. Eventually, Nadira helped her family stay due to her excellent testimony in court.

I felt Nadira's emotions were shown in a compelling manner. As the reader, I could see how she felt inferior to her older sister, Aisha, as Aisha always seemed to know the right thing to say and was appreciated by other people. I also felt the horrible fear along with Nadira as she realized that she and her family could be forced to leave their new home against their will.

Overall this was an interesting look at a situation we U.S. citizens can only imagine.

Compelling Read

By Sandhya Nankani

Marina Budhos's first YA novel is a moving story about nation, identity, patriotism, and what it means to be American in post 9-11 America. It is more than just the story of one family's struggle to stay afloat and remain "home" in the midst of crisis. Rather, it gives the experiences of an oft-invisible group of Americans a much-needed voice.

The prose is simple and succinct, and suitable for middle school students, but the content and themes are also sophisticated enough for high school and adult audiences. The theme is timely. The narrator is compelling.

I highly recommend "Ask Me No Questions." It's a valuable addition to post 9-11 literature.
